CHANGES, CHALLENGES, AND NEW OPPORTUNITIES FOR THE THIRD SECTOR

THE 6th ISTR ASIA AND PACIFIC REGIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE THIRD SECTOR, NOVEMBER 2-4, TAIPEI, TAIWAN

The world is under great transformation. Globalization has become a trend that is very difficult to resist. The result of it could be some countries or a few special locations receive great benefits, and living standards in those areas are greatly lifted. On the other hand, globalization has also brought many seriously social problems for the world, especially in those underdeveloped and developing countries. For example, the problems include poverty, inequalities, social exclusiveness, community dissolution, unsustainable environment, ethnic conflict, cultural tensions, among others. Accompanying with recent economic crisis around the world, it shows that globalization does not keep its promise to bring a better life for the entire world.

Arguments for free market in the era of globalization do also escort with a new neoliberal governance structure, and it probably can be named as privatization. The market mechanism and value of efficiency have become the major driving forces for the society. In order to increase capital accumulation and economic efficiency of the entire country many governments transform their roles and have partially abandoned their former obligations. Many powerless people located in some special places are left behind. On the same time, the political process is restrained to a limited elites; large numbers of people are turned off from participation. Problem of political legitimacy therefore has become a serious one in many countries.

This new world stage contains an imbalance and contradictory structure, and it has generated special concerns among diverse civil society actors on the kinds of social change that are occurring. Although civil society researchers and actors have shown significant advance in attaining more just and inclusive societies, there remain enormous challenges that demand multi-disciplinary approaches and new strategic alliances among the Third Sector and with the market and state sectors. The transforming world not only brings serious changes and challenges, but it probably also carries new opportunities for us. It invites scholars and practitioners to imagine a progressive and alternative future and to exchange their experiences and findings.
